The patent troll industry has exploded over the last few years, with many companies trying to buy patents and patents that are worthless or expired. A court will often see these companies as a threat to other small and medium-sized companies, but companies like Google and Microsoft do the same thing, and the two companies have faced no repercussions from the USPTO. So, the USPTO is trying to fix the problem by making it more expensive to buy a patent. In an article from Wired, the USPTO is warning companies that they are being sued and that they need to settle. In some cases, a company will have to pay $1 million a year for a patent. However, there is still a large gray area where companies pay between $15,000 and $50,000 a year and they are not being sued. Instead, the company just needs to file an intent to sue in the future. The USPTO is not trying to get rid of patent trolls, but they are trying to get companies to pay for the actual patents they are purchasing. A company can be sued by a patent troll, but they are not prevented from suing that company. The USPTO is also trying to force companies to use better resources to own their patents. For example, a company that owns a patent on a smartphone may not be able to actually produce that smartphone. The USPTO may help a company buy the patent for the design of a smartphone, but the company cannot actually make the smartphones. The USPTO is trying to stop any other companies from buying the patent or inventing the patent and handing it off to a troll. All of these companies have the right to protect their patents and companies who infringe upon their patents are at risk of being sued. At the moment, the USPTO is trying to change how patents are owned. However, it is not going to stop companies from buying these patents or from being sued by trolls. Companies like Google and Microsoft might be worried about it, but they are not willing to give up their millions of patents and the income they provide. The USPTO is 82157476af
